Community Supported Agriculture—in which members buy seasonal "shares" of a local farm's produce—has become de rigueur. Now, the movement is taking to the seas. Several Community Supported Fisheries have popped up around the country, from Alaska to North Carolina. One such CSF, Catch a Piece of Maine, offers the entire catch from an individual lobster trap for $2,995 a season. Online, members can interact with their own personal lobstermen, monitor their traps' intakes, and have catches shipped anywhere in the country overnight. That means at least 40 lobsters a year. And 10 percent of the profits will go to the Gulf of Maine Research Institute. (877-222-4630; catchapieceofmaine.com) —Chris Ladd
